

Facing Our Future:
Children in the Aftermath of Immigration Enforcement
Tuesday, February 2, 2010

Ajay Chaudry directs the Urban Institute's Center on Labor, Human Services, and Population. His research focuses on low-income working families, the employment of low-wage working mothers, the well-being and development of children from immigrant families, and the early childhood care system. From 2004 to 2006, Chaudry was New York City's deputy commissioner for child care and Head Start. He is the author of Putting Children First: How Low-Wage Working Mothers Manage Child Care.

Marilina Sanz is the associate legislative director for human services and education at the National Association of Counties. She was a legislative representative in the Mayor of New York's Washington office, where she covered public assistance, job training, and immigration issues. Prior to this position, she worked for the National Puerto Rican Coalition and advocated for the governor of Puerto Rico.

Carola Suárez-Orozco is a professor of applied psychology and co-director of Immigration Studies at New York University. Suárez-Orozco has published widely in the areas of cultural psychology, immigrant families and youth, academic performance among immigrant adolescents, and immigrant family separations. In 2006, she was awarded an American Psychological Association Presidential Citation for her work on the cultural psychology of immigration.

Kerri Sherlock Talbot is the chief counsel to Senator Robert Menendez (D-N.J.). She was previously the associate director of advocacy at the American Immigration Lawyers Association. Before that, she served as director of policy and planning for the Rights Working Group, overseeing immigration due process issues. Talbot has also served as managing attorney of the Break the Chain Campaign, where she represented immigrant victims of human trafficking and exploitation.

David Venturella is the acting director of the Office of Detention and Removal Operations with U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE). Previously, he was the executive director for ICE's Secure Communities program, which helps localities remove high-risk criminal aliens. He began his federal law enforcement career in Chicago in 1986 as a deportation officer, assistant district director, and deputy district director at the Immigration and Naturalization Service.

Richard Wolf (moderator) covers the White House as well as domestic and budget policy for USA Today, where he has worked for 20 years. He previously was the paper's congressional editor and has covered Congress, politics, health care, and welfare. From 1975 to 1986, Wolf worked for several Gannett newspapers in New York covering local, county, and state government. He moved to Washington, D.C., in 1986 to report for Gannett News Service.